Calf Shed

Exterior

This one-story building is constructed of poles, approximately 10" in diameter with 2x6 wood framing running horizontally between the vertically set poles. The poles act as pilings and serve as the foundation of the building. The wall framing is covered with corrugated metal panels. The poles also support a nearly flat shed roof of the same materials and construction techniques as the walls. There are no doors, rather the south side of the building is open. External light is admitted to the building through same opening. It was built during the 1970s of new materials.¹ The calf shed is identical in construction materials and techniques to the pole shed and other calf shed.

Interior

The interior is of exposed wood pole and lumber framing and metal and is otherwise unfinished.

Existing Condition

The building is in good condition at the present time.
